

Tell Me How You Feel About That

I've been in the helping profession for over 25 years. But the truth is that this vocation has been a part of me for as long as I can remember. My mom tells me stories about leaving me in the center of the mall when I was a child to go shopping (on purpose, with full intent of returning for me) and finding me engaged in a conversation with someone telling me the story of their life. I spent the first part of my adult life talking for a living. These days I listen more than I talk. I like this better. I have also enjoyed the practice of writing. Whether I am journaling, writing short stories, or blog entries, the act of stringing sentences and paragraphs together suits my introverted personality quite well. That's why I decided to write this shortbook. It's a completely selfish venture designed to combine two of my loves into one activity. Here you will find a collection of my writings from the last five years. There may be a secondary gain for you, the young (or seasoned) helper. You may get a brief mental vacation or possibly a new perspective on an old belief. You may also be encouraged to do some self-exploration into the deep recesses of your own mind and motives. Here's a couple of blanket disclaimers: 1. If you find anything offensive in this book, it's a typo and unintended. 2. If you think I am wrong about some of my assertions, you're right. I am nothing if not a collection of blind spots covered in skin.
