

Steps Between, Steps Within: Adolescents and Stepfamily Belonging: Using the Family Belonging Scale-Revised to Measure Level of Family Belonging for Stepfamily Adolescents

Many stepfamilies have found the transition to stepfamily living challenging, but this shift appears to be even more difficult for adolescents. Adolescents who reside in stepfamilies appear to be at somewhat higher risk for negative outcomes as compared to those in biological families. A higher sense of family belonging has been credited as a protective factor from risky behaviors, but to date there has been little research on stepfamily adolescents and family belonging. Existing measures of belonging concentrate on the feelings of warmth individuals perceive from their families while ignoring the inclusion and developmental fit aspects of this construct. The current study tested a revised measure of family belonging and examined factors related to the different contexts of stepfamily adolescents, and the relationship of these factors to the stepfamily adolescents levels of family belonging. Included are implications and recommendations for stepfamily adolescents and parents, as well as teachers and therapists.
