

Teaching Psychologists: Perceptions on the Ethics of Dual Relationships

Managing dual relationships is important for professional Psychologists, however the ethical views of professional Psychologists towards their subordinates differs once the working relationship has ended. Due to their complexity, the American Psychological Association does not maintain a proscription for engaging in nonsexual dual relationships by psychologists. Further, no guidelines exist regarding relationships with former students/supervisees. Psychological clinicians, educators, and supervisors surveyed from the 2004 Membership Directory of the APA were generally similar in ratings on each of the 23 wide-ranging questions of ethical behavior regarding current and former students/supervisees. Importantly, findings suggest that former students/supervisees may be considered in a no-mans land by their former superiors, treated less cautiously than present students/supervisees, but more cautiously than the general public might be treated. Together, the present findings suggest that the APA should consider specific guidelines to bring clarity to the ethics of dual relationships with former students/supervisees.
