

Psychological Review (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Psychological Review The present confusion in the domain of psychology with respect to its subject-matter and method need not be interpreted as a failure to justify its claims to be a science. It is indeed an indication of progress that psychologists are attempting to specify precisely what is the content and method of their domain. The difficulty of this specification is of course in great part owing to the extreme complexity of mental phenomena, but in spite of this difficulty, there are indications that psychology is beginning to interpret its phenomena in accordance with the logic of science. The fundamental purpose of science is to isolate certain phenomena, and to describe them so adequately, that their significance is understood, or that control over them is established. Science is essentially a process of critically evaluating facts and conditions, which are brought to its notice because of various human problems. Each particular science evaluates, that is, endows with meaning some specific type of phenomena. The importance of employing an adequate method of interpreting phenomena is therefore obvious, for otherwise the descriptions cannot but mislead the scientist and fail to satisfy the needs of his problems. In all sciences there is one outstanding condition of correct evaluation, and that is to keep as close as possible to observed data, and not to neglect complexity of fact, in an effort to gain simplicity of description.
